On July 23 in 2020, at 8 p.m., exactly a year before the games' opening ceremony will be held, Japanese swimming star Ikee Rikako spoke from the Japan National Stadium without spectators.

“①Sports (and unity / us / give / courage). When we stand up to difficulties, the power of hope is really (A),” said the swimmer appointed by the Tokyo Organising Committee of the Olympic and Paralympic Games. Ikee was diagnosed with leukemia in 2019 and now is trying to make a comeback in her sport.

In March Ikee returned to the swimming pool for the first time since February 2019. By appointing her, the Tokyo 2020 Organising Committee aims to give courage to athletes across the world because they are fighting with the sudden changes brought by the pandemic.

But public opinion on the Olympics and Paralympics is . In a survey conducted by Waseda and Doshisha universities in July, only 18.4% of respondents said they "agree" or "somewhat agree" with holding the Tokyo Games in their original form, while a total of 52.7% said they "disagree" or "somewhat disagree" with the idea.

While she acknowledged that many people disagree with the events going ahead, Ikee held a lantern containing the Olympic flame and spoke her words with feeling. She said, "One year from today, I want this place to shine with the flames of hope." And she continued, "The hopes for these games have shone for a long time, so however difficult it may be, we can face it and strive for them."
